G-MAN'S REVENGE

by Tim Standish

HE inky blackness of night blotted out the city. The usual hub-bub and sing-song of Chinatown had subsided. Noiselessly, two squad cars converged before a deserted warehouse, and equally silent, a dozen Federal Men stepped from them.

Chief Rollins gathered his men. "Now, listen," he said. "I don't have to tell you this is dangerous business. We're dealing with a vicious dope-smuggling ring. You all have your instructions. When you hear my whistle, every man is expected to do his duty. Ask no quarter and give none. That's all. Good luck!"

A few minutes later, each man was at his post, impatiently awaiting the blast of Rollins' whistle. Crouched in the arch of a doorway, McCabe tugged at Rollins' sleeve. He whispered, "There's only one thing I want to ask. No matter what happens, I want to get Ching Lo myself!"

"Don't be a fool! He's deadly," said Rollins.

"I asked for this assignment in Washington. Ching Lo or one of his rats killed my brother. I'm here to repay him. What do you say, Rollins?"

"I can't let you risk it. You're too valuable to the Service."

"I must get that snake myself. Just don't keep your eye on me when the fireworks start, so if anything happens, you won't be blamed for it!"

Rollins nodded, glancing at the luminous dial of his wrist watch. "Here we go!" There was a shrill blast from his whistle. The raid was on!

The seemingly dormant warehouse leapt to life. The staccato chant of tommy-guns mingled with cries of surprise and anguish as Rollins' men stampeded the warehouse. Guns spewed death and destruction among the smugglers.

In the melee, McCabe saw a figure retreat and dart down a corridor. Presuming he was fleeing to warn his master, McCabe sped after him.

"Master!" McCabe heard him shout. "Open! It is I, Sing Pu!"

McCabe crept up behind him. As the door creaked open, he brought down his revolver on the Oriental's skull. McCabe stepped through the shaft of light and into the room. The richness of it made him gasp. He could feel two eyes cutting through the subdued lighting and piercing his body.

He swung about to face Ching Lo. Over his usually impassive face was spread a veil of horror. "You! This cannot be. I killed you!" he screamed.

"That's what I wanted to know-who killed my twin brother!" McCabe snarled.

The crafty Oriental backed toward the wall, his hands behind him. Then a look of triumph formed over his face. He had found the button which would spring the trap, concealed by the rug, on which McCabe was now moving.

McCabe was close now. He was drawing back his arm to unleash a blow when the floor dropped from under him. He clawed madly at the air as he fell. His fingers cut into the small rug lapping over the edge of the chasm. On the other end of that rug stood Ching Lo! But only for a moment, for the force of McCabe's drop yanked the carpet and its diabolical owner into the gaping hole below.

McCabe clung by one hand to the edge of the floor. As the trap swung upward, he was lifted back with it.

Rollins burst into the room. "Are you all right?" he asked anxiously.

McCabe nodded wearily.

The chief patted him on the shoulder. "We got the rest of them. Don't worry if Ching Lo escaped. We'll catch up with him, too."

"You don't have to. He caught up with himself," McCabe said. "He's under this floor, dead in his own gas chamber. My brother has been avenged."
